

Theages

ΘΕΑΓΗΣ

Plato

translated by W.R.M. Lamb

Plato Scroll · plato-scroll.com

Scan to read online, free and offline
plato-scroll.com/s/theages/

121a

Demodocus: Socrates, I was wanting to have some private talk with you, if you had time to spare; even if there is some demand, which is not particularly important, on your time, do spare some, nevertheless, for me.

121a

Socrates: Why, in any case I happen to have time to spare, and for you, moreover, I have plenty. Well, you are free to say whatever you wish.

121a

Demodocus: Then do you mind if we step aside here from the street into the portico of Zeus the Liberator?

121a

Socrates: As you think best. [121b]

121b

Demodocus: Let us go, then. Socrates, it would seem that all growths follow the same course, both those that grow from the earth, and the animals, including man. In regard to the plants, as you know, we who cultivate the earth find it the easiest part of our work to make all our preparations that are needed before planting, and to do the planting itself; but when the plant begins to grow, thenceforward we have a great deal of difficult and vexatious business in tending the new growth. [121c] Such, it seems, is also the case in regard to men: I take my own concerns as evidence for judging of the rest. For indeed I have found the planting, or the procreation — whichever one ought to call it — of this son of mine the easiest thing in the world; but his upbringing has been vexatious and a constant source of alarm, so great are my fears for him. Among the many instances that I could mention, the desire which occupies him at the moment is a thing that especially alarms me: for it is not an ill-bred desire, but a dangerous one, since here we have him, Socrates, as he says, desiring to become wise. [121d] My opinion is that some of his fellow-townsmen, about his own age, who pay visits to the city, excite him with accounts of certain discussions they have heard there; and in his envy of these he has long been pestering me with the demand that I should take due thought for his needs, and pay fees to some sophist or other who will make him wise. Now I do not mind so much about the fees, but I believe he is running into no slight danger [122a] where he is hastening. I did for a time restrain him with good advice; but since I am no longer able to do so, I believe my best course is to comply with his request, in order that he may not resort, perchance, behind my back to somebody who will corrupt him. So I have come now on this very business of placing this youth with one of these sophists, or purveyors of wisdom, as they are held to be. It is a happy chance, therefore, that has thrown you in our way, as I should be particularly glad, with this plan of action in my mind, to ask your advice. Come, if you have any advice to give [122b] on what you have heard from me, you not only may, but should, give it.

122b

Socrates: Well, you know, Demodocus, they do say that advice is a holy thing. And so, if ever it is to be accounted holy, it must be in this instance, in which you now seek it. For there is no more divine matter on which a mortal could take counsel than the education either [122c] of himself or of his relations. Now, first of all, let you and me come to an agreement as to what we suppose that this thing can be, on which we are taking counsel; for it may happen that I conceive it to be one thing, and you another, and then when we have proceeded some little way in our conference, we may perceive how ridiculous we are, I the adviser and you the advised, in having no common ground in our notions.

122b

Demodocus: Why, I think you are right there, Socrates, and we should do as you suggest.

122b

Socrates: Yes, I am right, but yet not entirely, because I have a slight change to make. For it occurs to me that [122d] this youngster may not be desiring the thing that we suppose him to desire, but something else, and there again we may be still more absurdly taking counsel on some other thing. Hence our most proper course, it seems to me, is to begin with the youth himself, and inquire of him what it actually is that he desires.

122d

Demodocus: It does rather look, in fact, as though our best way would be thus, as you suggest.

122d

Socrates: Then tell me, what is the young person's goodly name: how are we to address him?

122d

Demodocus: Theages is his name, Socrates. [122e]

122d

Socrates: Goodly is the name, Demodocus, and holy-sounding, that you have bestowed on your son. Tell me, then, Theages, do you say you desire to become wise, and do you require your father here to find out a school of some man who is qualified to make you wise?

122e

Theages: Yes.

122e

Socrates: And which sort of man do you call wise, those who have knowledge of such and such a thing, whatever it may be, or those who have not?

122e

Theages: Those who have knowledge, I say.

122e

Socrates: Well now, has not your father taught and educated you in the subjects which form the education of everyone else here — all the sons of noble and honorable fathers — in letters, I mean, and harping and wrestling and the other sorts of contest? [123a]

122e

Theages: Yes, he has.

123a

Socrates: And you think you are still lacking in some knowledge which it behoves your father to provide for you?

123a

Theages: I do

123a

Socrates: What knowledge is it? Tell us on our side, that we may oblige you.

123a

Theages: He knows it, as well as I, Socrates, since I have often told him; only he says this to you of set purpose, making as if he did not know what I desire. For he assails me too with other statements of the same sort, and refuses to place me with any instructor. [123b]

123a

Socrates: Well, what you said to him before was spoken, as it were, without witnesses; but now you shall take me as a witness, and declare before me what is this wisdom that you desire. Come now; suppose you desired the wisdom whereby men steer a ship, and I happened to put this further question to you: Theages, what wisdom is it that you lack, when you blame your father for refusing to place you with people who would enable you to become wise? What answer would you have given me? What wisdom would you name? The steersman's art, would you not?

123b

Theages: Yes. [123c]

123b

Socrates: And if a desire to be wise in the wisdom whereby they steer chariots led you to blame your father, and I asked what wisdom this was, what would you name in reply? The charioteer's art, would you not?

123b

Theages: Yes.

123b

Socrates: And is that which you happen to be desiring now a nameless one, or has it a name?

123b

Theages: I should say it has a name.

123b

Socrates: Now do you know it, though not its name, or do you know its name as well?

123b

Theages: I know its name as well.

123b

Socrates: Then what is it? Tell me. [123d]

123d

Theages: What other name, Socrates, can one give it but wisdom?

123d

Socrates: And the driver's art too is wisdom? Or do you think it is ignorance?

123d

Theages: I do not.

123d

Socrates: You call it wisdom?

123d

Theages: Yes.

123d

Socrates: What use do we make of it? Is it not the art whereby we know how to govern a team of horses?

123d

Theages: Yes.

123d

Socrates: And the steersman's art too is wisdom?

123d

Theages: I think so.

123d

Socrates: Is not this the art whereby we know how to govern ships?

123d

Theages: Yes, it is.

123d

Socrates: And the wisdom that you so desire, what is it? [123e] That whereby we know how to govern whom?

123e

Theages: To govern men, I imagine.

123e

Socrates: Sick men, do you mean?

123e

Theages: Oh, no.

123e

Socrates: For that is medicine, is it not?

123e

Theages: Yes.

123e

Socrates: Well, that whereby we know how to govern the singers in a chorus?

123e

Theages: No.

123e

Socrates: For that is music?

123e

Theages: To be sure.

123e

Socrates: Well, that whereby we know how to govern men in gymnastic training?

123e

Theages: No.

123e

Socrates: For that is gymnastics?

123e

Theages: Yes.

123e

Socrates: Well, to govern people who do what? Endeavor your best to speak, as I did to you at the beginning. [124a]

124a

Theages: To govern the people in the city, I imagine.

124a

Socrates: And are the sick people also in the city?

124a

Theages: Yes, but I mean not these only, but all the rest who are in the city besides.

124a

Socrates: Do I understand what art it is that you mean? For you strike me as meaning, not that whereby we know how to govern reapers and harvesters and planters and sowers and threshers, for it is the farmer's art whereby we govern these, is it not?

124a

Theages: Yes. [124b]

124b

Socrates: Nor, I suppose, do you mean that whereby we know how to govern sawyers and borers and planers and turners, as a class together; for is not that carpentry?

124b

Theages: Yes.

124b

Socrates: But perhaps it is that whereby we govern, not only all these, but farmers themselves also, and carpenters, and all craftsmen and ordinary people, whether men or women: that, perhaps, is the wisdom you mean.

124b

Theages: That, Socrates, is what I have been intending to mean all the time. [124c]

124b

Socrates: Then can you tell me whether Aegisthus, who slew Agamemnon in Argos, governed all these people that you mean craftsmen and ordinary people, both men and women, or some other persons?

124b

Theages: No, just those.

124b

Socrates: Well now, did not Peleus, son of Aeacus, govern these same people in Phthia?

124b

Theages: Yes.

124b

Socrates: And have you ever heard of Periander, son of Cypselus, and how he governed at Corinth?

124b

Theages: I have.

124b

Socrates: Did he not govern these same people in his city? [124d]

124d

Theages: Yes.

124d

Socrates: Or again, do you not consider that Archelaus, son of Perdiccas, who governed recently in Macedonia, governed these same people?

124d

Theages: I do.

124d

Socrates: And who do you think were governed by Hippias, son of Peisistratus, who governed in this city? Were they not these people?

124d

Theages: To be sure they were.

124d

Socrates: Now, can you tell me what appellation is given to Bacis and Sibyl and our native Amphilytus?

124d

Theages: Why, soothsayers, of course, Socrates. [124e]

124e

Socrates: That is correct. But try to answer me in that way regarding those others — Hippias and Periander: what appellation is given them on account of their government?

124e

Theages: Despots, I suppose; it must be that.

124e

Socrates: And when a man desires to govern the whole of the people in his city, he desires the same government as those did — despotism, and to be a despot?

124e

Theages: Apparently.

124e

Socrates: And it is this that you say you desire?

124e

Theages: It seems so, from what I have said. [125a]

124e

Socrates: You scoundrel! So you were desiring to govern us, all the time that you were blaming your father for not sending you to some seminary of despots! And you, Demodocus, are you not ashamed of having known all the time what he is desiring, and though you could have sent him where you would have made him an expert in the wisdom which he desires, actually grudging it to him and refusing to send him? But now, look here, as he has declared against you in my presence, shall you and I consult together on the question of whose school we shall send him to, and whose classes will help him to become a wise despot? [125b]

125b

Demodocus: Yes, in faith, Socrates, let us certainly consult, as I feel this is a matter on which no slight counsel is needed.

125b

Socrates: By and by, my good sir. Let us first cross-examine him thoroughly.

125b

Demodocus: Examine him then.

125b

Socrates: Well now, what if we called in Euripides to our aid, Theages? For you know Euripides says: "Despots are wise by converse with the wise.

" Soph. Fr. 14.15 Now, if someone should ask Euripides: Euripides, in what [125c] are these men wise, by whose converse you say that despots are wise? I mean, suppose he had said: "Farmers are wise by converse with the wise,

"and we had asked him, — Wise in what? — what answer would he have given us? Surely none other than, — In farming.

125b

Theages: That, and none other.

125b

Socrates: Or again, if he had said: "Piemen are wise by converse with the wise,

"and we had asked him, Wise in what? — what answer would he have given us? He would have said, — In the pie-making business, — would he not?

125b

Theages: Yes.

125b

Socrates: Or again, if he had said”Wrestlers are wise by converse with the wise,
“and we had asked him, Wise in what? — would he not reply, — [125d]
In wrestling?

125d

Theages: Yes.

125d

Socrates: But as he said:”Despots are wise by converse with the wise, “? Soph. Fr. 14.1 and we ask him, — In what do you mean that the latter are wise, Euripides? — what will he reply? What sort of subjects will he mention here?

125d

Theages: Why, upon my word, I for my part do not know.

125d

Socrates: Well, do you mind if I tell you?

125d

Theages: If you do not mind.

125d

Socrates: They are the same subjects that Anacreon said Callicrite understood; or do you not know the ode?

125d

Theages: I do.

125d

Socrates: Well then, do you desire to partake in some instruction of that sort from any man [125e] who is a fellow-craftsman of Callicrite, daughter of Cyane, and knows all about despotism as she did, according to the poet, in order that you may become a despot over us and our city?

125e

Theages: You are joking all this time, Socrates, and making fun of me.

125e

Socrates: Why, do you not say that you desire that wisdom which will enable you to govern all the citizens? And in doing that, will you be anything else but a despot ?

125e

Theages: I should indeed pray, I imagine, that I might become a despot, [126a] if possible, over all men, and failing that, over as many as might be; so would you, I imagine, and everybody else besides: nay, even more, I daresay, that I might become a god; but I did not say I desired that.

126a

Socrates: Well, what on earth then is it that you do desire? Do you not say you desire to govern the citizens?

126a

Theages: Yes, but not by force, or as despots do, but with their consent, as is done by all the other men of importance in the state.

126a

Socrates: Do you mean, as by Themistocles and Pericles and Cimon, and by all those who have shown themselves able statesmen?

126a

Theages: Yes, in good earnest, I mean those people. [126b]

126a

Socrates: Then what if you chanced to desire to become wise in horsemanship? To whom would you have had to resort before expecting to be a clever horseman? To whom else but the horse-masters?

126b

Theages: To none else, I am sure.

126b

Socrates: And moreover, you would go to the actual men who are clever at the business, and who have horses and constantly use them in great numbers, both their own and other people's?

126b

Theages: Obviously I should.

126b

Socrates: And what if you wished to become wise in javelin-throwing? Would you not expect to get this wisdom by having resorted to those javelin-masters who have javelins and who constantly use javelins, [126c] both other people's and their own, in great numbers?

126b

Theages: I think so.

126b

Socrates: Then pray tell me, since it is your wish to become wise in state-matters, do you expect to get your wisdom by resorting to any other persons than those statesmen, who not only have their own ability in state-matters, but have constant dealings with other cities besides their own, by their intercourse alike with Greek cities and with foreign peoples? Or do you think to get wisdom in their business by resorting to any other persons than these particular men? [126d]

126d

Theages: Well, Socrates, I have heard of the argument that you are said to put forward — that the sons of those statesmen are no better men than the sons of shoemakers; and in my opinion your words are very true, from what I am able to gather. Hence I should be an utter fool if I supposed that any of these men would impart his wisdom to me when he never was of any use to his own son, as he would have been, if he were able to be of use in this matter to anyone at all in the world.

126d

Socrates: Then which way, most excellent sir, would you turn if, when you came to have a son, he should trouble you in the same manner, [126e] and tell you he desired to become a good painter, and should blame you, his father, for refusing to spend money on him for that very purpose, but at the same time should disregard the practitioners of that very thing, the painters, and decline to learn from them? Or the flute-players, when he wished to become a flute-player, or the harp-players? Would you know what to do with him, and where else you should send him if he refused to learn from these?

126e

Theages: Upon my word, I should not. [127a]

127a

Socrates: And do you now, when you are behaving in just the same way to your father, feel surprised and blame him for being at a loss what to do with you and where to send you? Why, we are ready to place you with any well-bred Athenian statesman you may choose, who will train you free of charge; and so not only will you be at no expense of money, but will gain far greater commendation amongst the mass of men than if you studied with anyone else.

127a

Theages: But then, Socrates, are not you too one of our well-bred gentlemen? Indeed, if you will agree to instruct me, I am content and seek no other. [127b]

127b

Socrates: What do you mean by that, Theages?

127b

Demodocus: Nay, Socrates, there is nothing amiss in what he says, and you will oblige me at the same time; for I should count it the greatest possible stroke of luck if he should welcome your instruction and you also should consent to instruct him. Nay, indeed, I am quite ashamed to say how keenly I wish it; but I entreat you both — you, to consent to teach Theages, and you, to seek the teaching of no one else than Socrates; you will thus relieve me [127c] of a harassing load of anxiety. For just now I am sorely afraid of his falling in with some other person who is likely to corrupt him.

127b

Theages: Have no more fears for me now, father, so long as you are able to persuade him to receive me as his pupil.

127b

Demodocus: Very rightly spoken. Socrates, from now onward we must address ourselves to you; for I am ready, in short, to place both myself and all that I hold dearest of what is mine in your hands — whatever you may require, [127d] absolutely — if you will open your arms to Theages here, and do him any service that you can.

127d

Socrates: Demodocus, your zeal is no wonder to me, if you suppose that I especially could be of use to him; for I know of nothing for which a sensible man could be more zealous than for his own son's utmost improvement. But how you came to form this opinion, that I would be better able to be of use to your son in his aim of becoming a good citizen than you would yourself, and how he came to suppose that I rather than yourself would be of use to him — this does fill me with wonder. For you, [127e] in the first place, are my elder, and further, you have held in your time many of the highest offices in Athens, and are respected by the people of Anagyrus above all your fellow-townsmen, and by the whole state as much as any man, whereas neither of you can notice anything like this about me. And moreover, if Theages here does despise the instruction of our statesmen, and is looking for some other persons who profess to be able to educate young people, we have here Prodicus of Ceos, Gorgias of Leontini, Polus of Acragas, [128a] and many more, who are so wise that they go to our cities and persuade the noblest and wealthiest of our young men — who have the choice of learning from any citizen they choose, free of charge — they persuade them to abandon that instruction and learn from them, with a deposit, besides, of a large sum of money as their fee, and to feel thankful in addition. Some of these persons might naturally have been chosen both by your son and by yourself, in preference to me; [128b] for I have no knowledge of those fair and beatific subjects of study: I only wish that I had. But what I always say, you know, is that I am in the position of knowing practically nothing except one little subject, that of love-matters. In this subject, however, I claim to be skilled above anybody who has ever lived or is now living in the world.

128b

Theages: Do you see, father? Socrates does not seem to me to be at all willing now to spend his time on me; for there is readiness enough on my part, [128c] if he is willing. But he is only jesting in what he has just told us. For I know of some of my equals in age, and some a little older, who were of no account before they learnt from him, but after beginning to learn from him have in a very short time proved themselves superior to all whose inferiors they were before.

128b

Socrates: And do you know what the meaning of it is, son of Demodocus?

128b

Theages: Yes, on my soul, I do — that, if it be your pleasure, I too shall be able to become such as those others are. [128d]

128d

Socrates: No, good sir, the meaning of it escapes you; but I will tell it you. There is something spiritual which, by a divine dispensation, has accompanied me from my childhood up. It is a voice that, when it occurs, always indicates to me a prohibition of something I may be about to do, but never urges me on to anything; and if one of my friends consults me and the voice occurs, the same thing happens: it prohibits, and does not allow him to act. And I will produce witnesses to convince you of these facts. You know our Charmides here, who has grown so handsome, the son of Glaucon: [128e] he once happened to be consulting me on his intention of training for the Nemean races, and he had no sooner begun to say that he intended to train than the voice occurred, and I tried to prevent him, saying— “Just as you were speaking my spirit-voice has occurred: no, you must not train.” “Perhaps,” said he, “it indicates to you that I shall not win; but even if I am not to win, at any rate the exercise I shall get in the meantime will do me good.” So saying, he went and trained; and so you may as well inquire of him [129a] as to the results he got from his training. Or if you like, ask Cleitomachus, brother of Timarchus, what Timarchus said to him when he was going straight to the prison to meet his death, he and Euathlus the racing runner, who had harbored Timarchus as a fugitive; for he will tell you that the words he spoke to him were these:

129a

Theages: What?

129a

Socrates: “Cleitomachus,” he said, “I tell you I am going to my death now, because I would not take Socrates’ advice.” Now, why on earth did Timarchus say that? I will tell you. When Timarchus and Philemon, [129b] son of Philemonides, got up from the wine-party to kill Nicias, son of Heroscandrus, those two alone had knowledge of the plot; and Timarchus, as he got up, said to me: “What say you, Socrates? Go on drinking, all of you; I have to get up and go somewhere, but I will join you a little later, if I get the chance.” Then occurred that voice of mine, and I said to him: “No, no, do not get up; for my accustomed spiritual sign has occurred to me.” [129c] So he stopped. Then after an interval of time he again started to go, and said: “Well, I am going, Socrates.” Again the voice occurred, and so again I constrained him to stop. The third time, wishing to give me the slip, he got up without saying another word to me; he gave me the slip by watching until my attention was turned elsewhere. Thus it was that he went right off and committed the deed which was the cause of his going then to his death. And hence it was that he spoke those words to his brother which I quoted to you just now, that he was going to his death because he had not taken my advice. [129d] And moreover, in regard to the Sicilian business, many will tell you what I said about the destruction of the army. As to bygonas, you may hear from those who know: but there is an opportunity now of testing the worth of what the sign says. For as the handsome Sannio was setting out on campaign, the sign occurred to me, and he has gone now with Thrasyllus on an expedition bound for Ephesus and Ionia. I accordingly expect him to be either killed or brought very near it, and I have great fears for our force as a whole. [129e]

Now I have told you all this, because this spiritual power that attends me also exerts itself to the full in my intercourse with those who spend their time with me. To many, indeed, it is adverse, and it is not possible for these to get any good by conversing with me, and I am therefore unable to spend my time in conversing with them. And there are many with whom it does not prohibit my intercourse, yet the intercourse does them no good. But those who are assisted in their intercourse by that spiritual power are the persons whom you have noticed; for they make rapid progress there and then. And of these, again, who make progress some find the benefit [130a] both solid and enduring; while there are many who, for as long a time as they are with me, make wonderful progress, but when they are parted from me relapse, and are no different from anybody else. This once befell Aristeides, son of Lysimachus, son of Aristeides. For by conversing with me he had made immense progress in a little time; and then he had to go on an expedition, and he went and sailed away. On his return he found that Thucydides, son of Melesias, son of Thucydides, had been conversing with me. Now Thucydides, the day before, had quarrelled with me [130b] over some arguments we had had. So when Aristeides saw me, after greeting me and talking of other affairs, he said: "But Thucydides, I hear, Socrates, is somewhat on his dignity with you, and is annoyed as though he were somebody. "Yes, that is so," I replied. "Well, but does he not know," he said, "what a sad slave he was, before he associated with you?" "It seems not," I replied, "upon my soul." "But indeed I myself also," he said, "am in a ridiculous position, [130c] Socrates." "How exactly?" I asked. "Because," he replied, "before I sailed away, I was able to discuss things with anybody, and show myself inferior to none in argument, so that I even sought out the debates of the most accomplished people: but now, on the contrary, I shun them, wherever I notice there is anyone of education, so ashamed I am of my own ineptitude." "Tell me," I said, "did this power forsake you of a sudden, or little by little?" "Little by little," he replied. "And when it was present with you," I asked, [130d] "was it present through your having learnt something from me, or in some other way?" "I will tell you, Socrates," he said, "what is incredible, upon my soul, yet true. For I never yet learnt anything from you, as you know yourself: but I made progress, whenever I was with you, if I was merely in the same house, without being in the same room, but more progress, when I was in the same room. And it seemed to me to be much more when I was in the same room and looked at you as you were speaking, than when [130e] I turned my eyes elsewhere: but my progress was far the greatest and most marked whenever I sat beside you and held and touched you. Now, however,” he said, “that condition has all oozed away.”

Such then, Theages, is the intercourse you would have with me: if God so wills, you will make very great and rapid progress, but otherwise, you will not. Consider, therefore, if it is not safer for you to be educated by one of those persons who have command themselves of the benefit which they bestow on mankind, rather than follow the course on which you may chance with me. [131a]

131a

Theages: Well then, I decide, Socrates, that our plan shall be to make trial of that spiritual sign by associating with each other. Thus, if it leaves us free, that will be best of all; if it does not, it will be time then for us to consider, at the moment, what we shall do — whether we shall associate with someone else, or try to conciliate the divine sign itself that occurs to you with prayers and sacrifices and anything else that the seers may indicate.

131a

Demodocus: In view of this, Socrates, say no more in opposition to the lad; for Theages is right in what he says.

131a

Socrates: Well, if you consider that this is what we ought to do, let us do it.