

The Minos

MINΩΣ

Plato

translated by Thomas Taylor (1804)

Plato Scroll · plato-scroll.com

Scan to read online, free and offline
plato-scroll.com/s/minos-g/

The Minos

313a

Socrates: What is law with us?

313a

Minos: About what kind of law do you interrogate?

313a

Socrates: What is that by which law differs from law, according to this very thing, the being law?

313b

For consider what I ask you. For I ask as if I should inquire what gold is; and if you in a similar manner should ask me, about what kind of gold I inquire, I should think you would not rightly interrogate. For neither does gold differ in any thing from gold, so far as it is gold, nor a stone from a stone, so far as it is a stone. And in like manner, neither does law differ in any thing from law; but all laws are the same. For each of them is similarly law; nor is one more, but the other less so. I ask you, therefore, the whole of this very thing, what law is; and if you have an answer at hand give it me.

313b

Minos: What else, Socrates, will law be than things established by law?

313c

Socrates: Does speech also appear to you to be things which are spoken? or sight things which are seen? or hearing things which are heard? Or is speech one thing, and are things spoken another?

313d

Is sight one thing, and are things seen another? Is hearing one thing, and are things heard another? And, is law one thing, and are things established by law another? Is this the case, or how does it appear to you?

313e

Minos: This now appears to me to be the case.

313e

Socrates: Law, therefore, is not things established by law.

313e

Minos: It does not appear to me that it is.

314a

Socrates: What law, therefore, may be, let us thus consider. If some one should ask us respecting those things of which we have just now spoken, since you say that things visible are seen by the sight, what the sight is by which they are seen? we should answer him, that it is a sense which through the eyes manifests colours to us. And if he should again ask us what the hearing is by which things are heard? we should reply, that it is a sense which through the ears manifests to us sounds. In like manner, if he should ask us, since legal institutions are legally established by law, what is law by which they are thus established? whether is it a certain sense, or manifestation? in the same manner as things which are learnt, are learnt by science rendering them manifest. Or is it a certain invention? just as things which are discovered are invented: as, for instance, things salubrious and noxious are discovered by medicine; but the conceptions of the Gods, as prophets say, by divination.

314b

For the divining art is with us an invention of such like things: Or is it not?

314c

Minos: Entirely so.

314c

Socrates: Which of these, therefore, may we especially presume law to be? Shall we say it is these dogmas and decrees?

314c

Minos: It appears so to me. For what else can any one say law is? So that it appears the whole of this which you ask, viz. law, is the dogma of the city.

314c

Socrates: You call, as it seems, law, political opinion.

314c

Minos: I do.

314d

Socrates: And perhaps you speak well; but perhaps we shall know better in the following manner. Do you say that some men are wise?

314d

Minos: I do.

314d

Socrates: Are not the wise, therefore, wise by wisdom?

314d

Minos: Yes.

314d

Socrates: But what? are the just, just by justice?

314d

Minos: Entirely so.

314d

Socrates: Are the legitimate, therefore, also legitimate by law?

314d

Minos: Yes.

314d

Socrates: And the illegitimate, illegitimate by a privation of law?

314d

Minos: Yes.

314d

Socrates: And are the legitimate just?

314d

Minos: Yes.

314d

Socrates: But the illegitimate unjust?

314d

Minos: Unjust.

314d

Socrates: Are not justice and law, therefore, things most beautiful?

314d

Minos: They are.

314d

Socrates: And are not injustice and illegality most base?

314d

Minos: Yes.

314e

Socrates: And does not one of these preserve cities and every thing else, but the other destroy and subvert them?

314e

Minos: Yes.

314e

Socrates: It is necessary, therefore, dianoëticaally to consider law as something beautiful, and to investigate it as good.

314e

Minos: How should we not?

314e

Socrates: Have we not, therefore, said that law is the dogma of the city?

314e

Minos: We have said so.

314e

Socrates: What then? Are not some dogmas good, and others bad?

314e

Minos: They are.

314e

Socrates: Law however is not bad.

314e

Minos: It is not.

314e

Socrates: It is not, therefore; right simply to determine that law is the dogma of the city.

314e

Minos: It does not appear to me that it is.

314e

Socrates: The assertion, therefore, does not accord with the truth, that law is a base dogma.

315a

Minos: It does not.

315a

Socrates: Law however appears also to me to be a certain opinion. And since it is not a base opinion, is not this, therefore, evident, that it is a good opinion, if law is opinion?

315a

Minos: Yes.

315a

Socrates: But is not a certain good, a true, opinion?

315a

Minos: Yes.

315a

Socrates: Is, therefore, true opinion the discovery of being?

315a

Minos: It is.

315a

Socrates: Law, therefore, is the discovery of being.

315a

Minos: But, Socrates, if law is the discovery of being, how is it that we do not always use the same laws about the same things, since beings are discovered by us?

315b

Socrates: Nevertheless law wishes to be the discovery of being; but men, as it seems, not always using the same laws, are not always able to discover that which law wishes, viz. being. But come, let us see if it will hence become evident to us, whether we always use the same laws, or different laws at different times; and if all of us use the same laws, or different persons different laws.

315c

Minos: But this, Socrates, is not difficult to know, that neither do the same persons always use the same laws, nor different persons always different laws. Thus, for example, it is not a law with us to sacrifice men, but this is considered as unholy; but the Carthaginians sacrifice men, this being holy and legal with them; so that some of them sacrifice their sons to Saturn, as perhaps you have heard. And not only do Barbarian men use laws different from ours, but also those in Lycia. And as to the progeny of Athamas¹, what sacrifices do they perform, though they are Greeks? You also know and have heard what laws we formerly used concerning the dead, cutting the throats of the victims before the dead body was carried out, and calling those that carry the sacrifices to the dead. And those still prior to these buried the dead at home; but we do none of these. Ten thousand instances likewise of this might be adduced. For the field of demonstration is very wide, that neither we always think invariably the same with ourselves, nor men with each other.

315c

Socrates: It is by

315d

no means wonderful, O best of men, if you speak rightly, and this should be concealed from me. But till you by yourself declare what appears to you, in a long discourse, and I again do the same, we shall never, as I think, agree. If however a common subject of speculation is proposed, we shall perhaps accord. If, therefore, you are willing, interrogating me, consider together with me in common. Or, if it is more agreeable to you, instead of interrogating, answer.

315e

Minos: But I wish, Socrates, to reply to any question you may propose.

315e

Socrates: Come then. Whether do you think that just things are unjust, and unjust things just? Or that just things are just, and unjust things unjust?

315e

Minos: I indeed think that just things are just, and unjust things unjust.

316a

Socrates: Is this opinion, therefore, entertained among all men, as well as here?

316a

Minos: Yes.

316a

Socrates: Among the Persians also?

316a

Minos: And among the Persians too.

316a

Socrates: But is this opinion always entertained?

316a

Minos: Always.

316a

Socrates: Whether are things which attract more, thought by us to be heavier, but things which attract less, lighter? or the contrary?

316a

Minos: Not the contrary: but things which attract more are heavier, and things which attract less are lighter.

316a

Socrates: Is this the case, therefore, in Carthage and in Lycia?

316a

Minos: Yes.

316b

Socrates: Things beautiful, as it seems, are every where thought to be beautiful; and things base to be base: but things base are not thought to be beautiful, nor things beautiful base.

316b

Minos: It is so.

316b

Socrates: As we may say, therefore, in all things, beings are thought to be, and not non-beings, both with us and with all others.

316b

Minos: It appears so to me.

316c

Socrates: He, therefore, who wanders from being wanders from that which is legitimate.

316c

Minos: Thus, Socrates, as you say, these things always appear legitimate both to us and to others. But when I consider that we never cease transposing laws upwards and downwards, I cannot be persuaded by what you say.

316c

Socrates: Perhaps you do not perceive that these things thus transposed continue to be the same. But thus consider them together with me. Did you ever meet with any book concerning the health of the sick?

316c

Minos: I have.

316c

Socrates: Do you know, therefore, to what art this book belongs?

316c

Minos: I know that it belongs to the art of medicine.

316c

Socrates: Do you, therefore, call those who are scientifically skilled about these things, physicians?

316c

Minos: I call them so.

316d

Socrates: Whether, therefore, do those that have a scientific knowledge think the same things about the same, or do some of these think differently from others about the same things?

316d

Minos: They appear to me to think the same things.

316d

Socrates: Whether, therefore, do the Greeks alone accord with the Greeks about things of which they have a scientific knowledge, or do the Barbarians also both accord with each other about such things, and with the Greeks?

316d

Minos: There is an abundant necessity that both Greeks and Barbarians who possess a scientific knowledge should accord in opinion with each other.

316e

Socrates: You answer well. Do they not, therefore, always accord?

316e

Minos: Yes, always.

316e

Socrates: Do not physicians also write those things about health which they think to be true?

316e

Minos: Undoubtedly.

316e

Socrates: Things medicinal, therefore, and medicinal laws, these are the writings of physicians.

316e

Minos: Things medicinal, certainly.

316e

Socrates: Whether, therefore, are geometrical writings also geometrical laws?

316e

Minos: Yes.

316e

Socrates: Of whom, therefore, are the writings and legitimate institutions concerning gardening?

316e

Minos: Of gardeners.

316e

Socrates: Those laws, therefore, pertain to gardening.

316e

Minos: They do.

316e

Socrates: Are they not, therefore, the laws of those who know how to manage gardens?

316e

Minos: How should they not?

316e

Socrates: But gardeners possess this knowledge.

316e

Minos: Yes.

316e

Socrates: But of whom are the writings and legitimate institutions concerning food?

316e

Minos: Of cooks.

316e

Socrates: Those, therefore, are cooking laws.

316e

Minos: Cooking.

316e

Socrates: And of those, as it seems, who know how to manage the preparation of food.

316e

Minos: Yes.

317a

Socrates: But cooks, as they say, possess this knowledge.

317a

Minos: They do possess it.

317a

Socrates: Be it so. But of whom are the writings and legal institutions concerning the government of a city? Are they not of those who scientifically know how to govern cities?

317a

Minos: It appears so to me.

317a

Socrates: But do any others than politicians and kings possess this knowledge?

317a

Minos: They alone possess it.

317b

Socrates: These writings, therefore, are political, which men call the writings of kings and good men.

317b

Minos: You speak the truth.

317b

Socrates: Those, therefore, who possess a scientific knowledge do not at different times write differently about the same things.

317b

Minos: Certainly not.

317b

Socrates: If, therefore, we see certain persons doing this, whether shall we say that those who act in this manner are scientific or unscientific?

317b

Minos: Unscientific.

317b

Socrates: Shall we, therefore, say that what is right in every particular is legitimate, whether it be medicinal, or pertain to cooking, or to gardening?

317c

Minos: Yes.

317c

Socrates: But with respect to what is not right, this we no longer assert to be legitimate.

317c

Minos: No longer.

317c

Socrates: It, therefore, becomes illegitimate.

317c

Minos: Necessarily so.

317c

Socrates: Hence, in writings concerning things just and unjust, and, in short, concerning the orderly distribution of a city, and the manner in which it ought to be governed, that which is right is a royal law; but that which is not right does not appear to be a royal law, because science is wanting; for it is illegal.

317c

Minos: It is.

317d

Socrates: We have rightly, therefore, acknowledged that law is the invention of being.

317d

Minos: So it appears.

317d

Socrates: Further still, this also we should consider in it: who is it that scientifically knows how to sow seeds in the earth?

317d

Minos: The husbandman.

317d

Socrates: Does he then sow fit seeds in each soil?

317d

Minos: Yes.

317d

Socrates: The husbandman, therefore, is a good distributor of these things, and his laws and distributions in these particulars are right.

317d

Minos: Yes.

317d

Socrates: But who is a good dispensator of pulsations for melodies, and distributes such things as are fit? And whose laws also, if he has any, are right?

317e

Minos: The laws of the piper, and those of the harper.

317e

Socrates: He, therefore, who is most legitimate in these things is in the most eminent degree a piper.

317e

Minos: Yes.

317e

Socrates: But who in the best manner distributes nutriment to the bodies of men? Does not he do this who distributes that which is fit?

317e

Minos: Yes.

317e

Socrates: The distributions, therefore, and the laws of this man are the best; and he who is most legitimate about these things is the most excellent distributor.

318a

Minos: Entirely so.

318a

Socrates: Who is he?

318a

Minos: The instructor of children.

318a

Socrates: Does he know how to feed the flock of the human body in the best manner?

318a

Minos: Yes.

318a

Socrates: But who is he that feeds in the best manner a flock of sheep? What is his name?

318a

Minos: A shepherd.

318a

Socrates: The laws, therefore, of the shepherd are the best for the sheep.

318a

Minos: They are.

318a

Socrates: And those of the herdsman for oxen.

318a

Minos: Yes.

318b

Socrates: But whose laws are the best for the souls of men? Are they not those of a king?

318b

Minos: They are.

318b

Socrates: You speak well. Can you, therefore, tell me who among the antients was a good legislator in the laws pertaining to pipes? Perhaps you do not recollect. Are you, therefore, willing that I should remind you?

318b

Minos: Perfectly so.

318b

Socrates: Marsyas, then, and his beloved Olympus the Phrygian were of this description.

318b

Minos: True.

318c

Socrates: The harmony produced by the pipes of these men is most divine, and alone excites and unfolds those that stand in need of the Gods². It likewise alone remains to the present time as being divine.

318c

Minos: These things are so.

318c

Socrates: But who among the antient kings is said to have been a good legislator, and whose legal institutions even now remain as being divine?

318c

Minos: I do not recollect.

318c

Socrates: Do you not know who they were that used the most antient laws of the Greeks?

318d

Minos: Do you speak of the Lacedæmonians, and Lycurgus the legislator?

318d

Socrates: These institutions, however, have not perhaps been established three hundred years, or very little more than this. But do you know whence the best of their laws were derived?

318d

Minos: They say, from Crete.

318d

Socrates: Do they, therefore, of all the Greeks use the most antient laws?

318d

Minos: Yes.

318d

Socrates: Do you know then who among these were good kings? I mean Minos and Rhadamanthus, the sons of Jupiter and Europa, by whom these laws were framed.

318e

Minos: They say, Socrates, that Rhadamanthus was a just man, but that Minos was rustic, morose and unjust.

318e

Socrates: You relate, O best of men, an Attic and tragical fable.

318e

Minos: Are not these things reported of Minos?

318e

Socrates: They are not by Homer and Hesiod, whose authority is greater than that of all the tragic poets from whom you assert these things.

318e

Minos: But what do they say about Minos?

319a

Socrates: I will tell you, lest you as well as the many should be guilty of impiety. For there is not any thing which is more impious than this; *nor is there any thing of which we ought to be more afraid, than of offending against THE GODS either in word or in deed*³. And next to this we should be fearful of offending against divine men. We should however be very cautious, when we praise or blame any man, that we do not speak erroneously; and for the sake of this it is necessary that we should learn to know good and bad men. For divinity is indignant when any one blames a man similar to himself, or praises one dissimilar to him: but the former of these is the good man. Nor ought you to think that stones, pieces of wood, birds and serpents are sacred, but that men are not so: for a good man is the most sacred, and a depraved man the most defiled, of all things.

319b

Now, therefore, since Homer and Hesiod pass an encomium on Minos, on this account I thus speak, lest you, being a man sprung from a man, should sin in what you say against a hero the son of Jupiter. For Homer⁴, speaking of Crete, that there are many men and ninety cities in it, says that among these is Gnosus, a great city in which Minos reigned, who for nine years conversed with the mighty Jupiter. This then is Homer's encomium of Minos, which though short is such as he does not give to any one of his heroes.

319c

For that Jupiter is a sophist⁵, and that the art itself is all-beautiful, he evinces as well in many other places as here. For he says that Minos conversed nine years with Jupiter, and went to be instructed by him, as if Jupiter were a sophist. That Homer, therefore, does not bestow this honour of being instructed by Jupiter on any other hero than Minos alone, must be considered as a wonderful praise.

319d

Ulysses also, in speaking of the dead⁶, represents Minos judging with a golden sceptre in his hand; but neither here nor in any other place does he speak of Rhadamanthus as judging, or as conversing with Jupiter. On this account I say that Minos is extolled by Homer beyond all other heroes. For that being the son of Jupiter, he was only instructed by Jupiter, contains no transcendancy of praise. For the verse which says that Minos reigned nine years, and conversed with the mighty Jupiter, signifies that he was the associate of Jupiter; since λόγοι are discourses, and ὁρίστης is an associate in discourse. Hence, for nine years Minos went to the cavern of Jupiter, learning some things, and teaching others, which during these nine years he had received from Jupiter. There are however some who conceive ὁρίστης to signify the associate of Jupiter in drinking and sport. But that those who thus conceive say nothing to the purpose, may be inferred from this, that, as both the Greeks and Barbarians are numerous, there are none among these who abstain from banquets, and that sport to which wine belongs, except the Cretans and the Lacedæmonians, who were instructed by the Cretans. In Crete, too, this is one of the other laws which Minos established, that men should not drink with each other to intoxication.

319e

320a

And this indeed is evident, that he made those things to be laws for his citizens which he thought to be beautiful.

320b

For Minos did not, like a base man, think one thing, and do another different from what he thought; but his association with Jupiter was as I have said through discourse, in order to be instructed in virtue. Hence he established these laws for his citizens through which Crete is perpetually happy, and also Lacedæmon, from the time in which it began to use these laws, in consequence of their being divine.

320c

But Rhadamanthus was indeed a good man; for he was instructed by Minos. He did not however learn the whole of the royal art, but that part of it which is of the ministrant kind, and which possesses authority in courts of judicature; and hence he is said to have been a good judge. For Minos employed him as a guardian of the laws in the city; but he used Talus⁷ for this purpose through the rest of Crete. For Talus thrice every year went through the villages in order to preserve the laws in them, and carried with him the laws written in tables of brass;

320d

whence also he was called brazen. Hesiod also asserts things similar to these of Minos. For, having mentioned his name, he says⁸ that he was the most royal of mortal kings, and that he reigned over many neighbouring men, having the sceptre of Jupiter, with which also he governed cities. And he calls the sceptre of Jupiter nothing else than the discipline of Jupiter, by which he governed Crete.

320e

Minos: On what account then, Socrates, came the report to be spread that Minos was an unlearned and morose man?

320e

Socrates: On that account through which you, O best of men, if you are prudent, and every other man who intends to be celebrated, will be cautious never to offend a poet. For poets are able to effect much with respect to opinion, both in praising men and blaming them. In this particular, therefore, Minos erred when he warred on this city, in which there is much other wisdom, together with tragic and other poets of every description. But the tragedy here is antient, not originating, as is generally thought, from Thespis, nor from Phrynicus; but, if you consider, you will find that it is a very antient invention of this city. Tragedy indeed is of all poetry the most pleasing to the vulgar, and the most alluring; to which applying ourselves we have taken vengeance on Minos, for which he has compelled us to pay those tributes. In offending us, therefore, Minos erred; whence, in reply to your question, he became infamous. For that he was a good man, a friend to law, and a good shepherd of the people, as I have before observed, this is the greatest token, that his laws are immutable, in consequence of having well discovered the truth concerning the government of a city.

321a

321b

Minos: You appear to me, Socrates, to have discovered a probable reason.

321b

Socrates: If, therefore, I speak the truth, do not the Cretans, the citizens of Minos and Rhadamnathus, appear to you to have used the most antient laws?

321c

Minos: They do.

321c

Socrates: These, therefore, were the best legislators of the antients, and were also shepherds of men; just as Homer likewise says, that a good general is the shepherd of the people.

321c

Minos: Entirely so.

321c

Socrates: Come then, by Jupiter, who presides over friendship, if any one who is a good legislator and shepherd of the body should ask us what those things are which when distributed to the body will make it better, we should well and briefly answer, that they are nutriment and labour, the former of which by increasing, and the latter by exercising, give stability to the body.

321c

Minos: Right.

321c

Socrates: If, therefore, after this, that good legislator and shepherd should also ask us what those things are which being distributed to the soul make it better, what shall we answer, that we may not be ashamed of ourselves and of our age?

321d

Minos: I am no longer able to answer this question.

321d

Socrates: It is however disgraceful to the soul of each of us, if we should appear to be ignorant of things pertaining to our souls, in which good and evil are contained, but to be knowing in particulars pertaining to the body, and to other things.

Notes

¹ Athamas was the son of Æolus, and king of Thebes in Bœotia.

² See the speech of Alcibiades in The Banquet.

³ This among many other passages must convince the most careless reader, that Plato was a firm believer in the religion of his country.

⁴ Odyss. lib. xix. ver. 172, &c.

⁵ That is, one endued with wisdom; for this is the original meaning of the word.

⁶ Odyss. lib. xi.

⁷ A son of Cres, the founder of the Cretan nation.

⁸ What Plato here cites from Hesiod is not to be found in any of the writings of that poet now extant.